

Review of the Paper- Crime victims' Right of Compensation in Bangladesh: A comparative approach

This paper is on an important topic. The importance of the paper is immense, as it examines the crimes victims' rights of compensation in Bangladesh, from a comparative approach. I feel that the main contribution of the paper is rather empirical and quite revealing. The arguments about crimes victims' rights of compensation are convincing, making a fair balanced of judgments by the researcher himself and assessing of other materials presented in the paper.

Understanding of the topic is reasonably well; the way in which research contents and issues are outlined and dealt in the paper. The title is quite appropriate in the light of the context of broader area of research. In terms of the literature review, the paper is mostly comprehensive and most of the references cited in the paper are widely read and familiar to scholars in the field.

In terms of thoroughness, the analysis is well balanced and sufficiently clear for the arguments and contexts of the paper. Since the paper is about the understanding of the from a comparative approach Fhameda Quadder has rightly approached her research towards descriptive nature of investigation. The discussion corresponds to the results of the study is linked well.

The paper attempts to make some useful conclusions about crimes victims' rights of compensation in Bangladesh. Despite raising few points I have very much enjoyed reading the paper. I believe that the paper will have a wider contribution towards understanding of "crimes victims' rights of compensation" in Bangladesh.

Based on assessing the criteria, to my judgment, the paper as its present form is acceptable for publication.